

NetChoice

Republicans do not want aggressive antitrust reform to hurt their online experience. They want their lawmakers to oppose it.

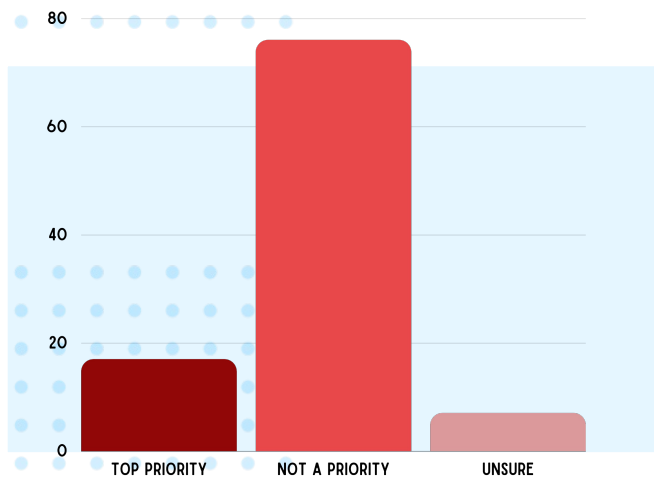

Echelon Insights surveyed 3,893 registered voters across the U.S. about tech issues. This is what the Republicans polled thought:

60

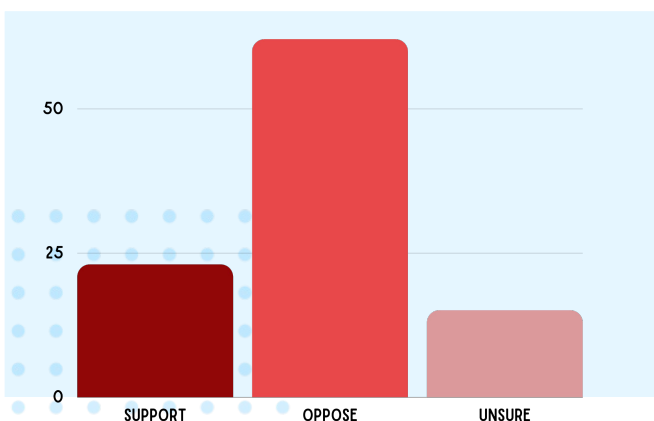

Conservative voters are less likely to vote for lawmakers supporting bills like S.2992 that eliminate their online services.

54% of Republicans polled would be less likely to vote for someone who supports a bill that eliminates certain digital services

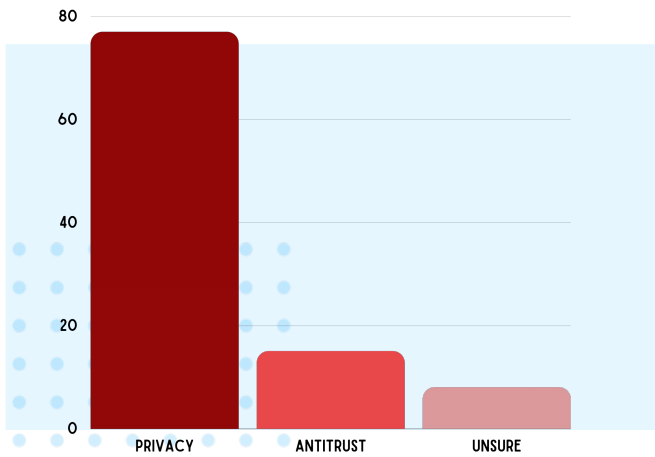

Regulation of online services is not a priority for Republican voters.

76% of Republican voters think our politicians should be focusing elsewhere as other issues are more important right now.

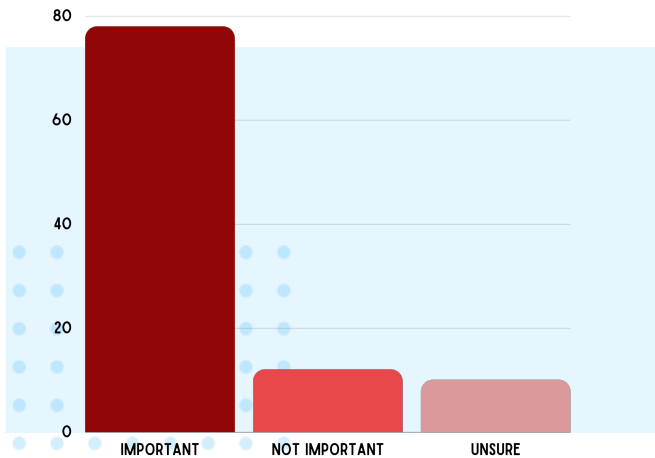

Conservatives want American tech companies to succeed. They don't want Congress advantaging foreign competitors.

62% of conservatives polled oppose a bill that would disadvantage American tech companies compared to foreign competitors.

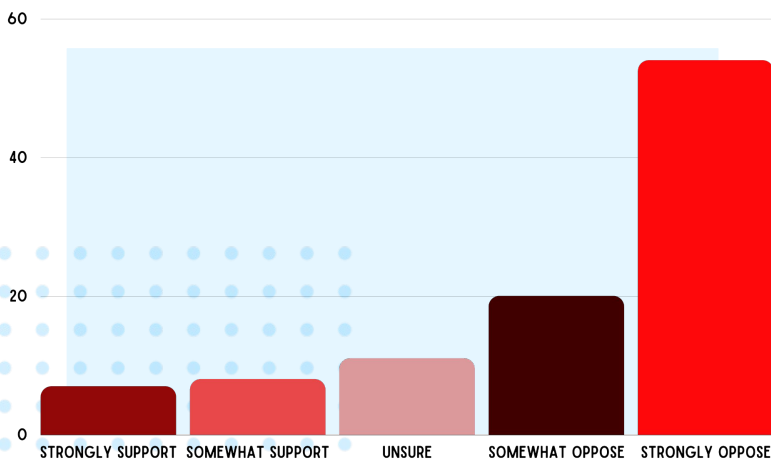

Republican voters want Congress to focus on their privacy and security concerns, not antitrust.

77% of Republicans say that when it does come to tech issues, their data and privacy online is a far greater priority than reforming competition and antitrust laws.

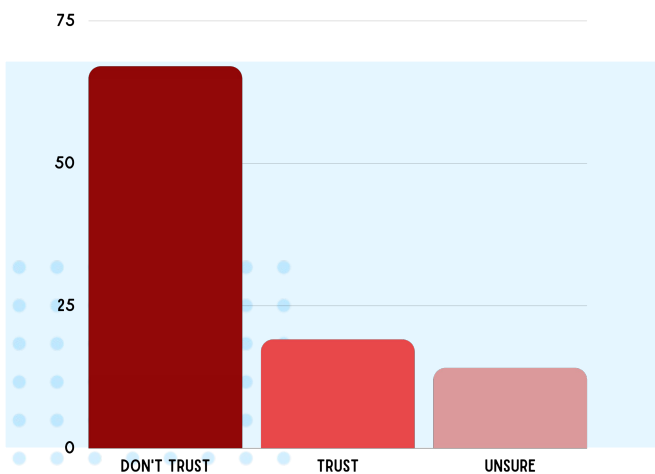

Republican voters want their lawmakers to ensure bills like S.2992 don't make it harder to protect their data online.

In fact, when considering proposals to regulate the tech industry, 78% of Republicans believe it's important that Congress does not pass laws that make it harder for companies to protect their privacy and data.

Republican voters oppose legislation like S.2992 that requires data-sharing with foreign companies.

74% of Republicans oppose bills that require data sharing with foreign companies. 54% of Republicans polled strongly oppose.

Because of their concerns, Republicans don't trust Congress to regulate American tech.

67% of conservatives polled do not trust Congress to regulate digital services.