

Don't Buy the Failed Progressive Antitrust Agenda

A few members of Congress are trying to reintroduce failed antitrust pitches from the 117th Congress. Here's why lawmakers should think twice about supporting them:

They will increase inflation

Several studies, including those from nonpartisan organizations, show that these types of proposals will raise prices for Americans.

This abysmal finding comes on the heels of prices—especially on food—rising consistently across the U.S. for the last year.

They compromise American privacy and security online

National security and policy experts alike have sounded the alarm on how similar proposals would unintentionally open up tech users to increased cybersecurity and privacy threats, by forcing companies to make public their security blueprints and restricting the practices businesses use to keep us safe on our devices.

Each of these proposals failed to gain enough bipartisan support last Congress

Despite the PR campaign by the few supporters of this package, these proposals did not gain enough support last Congress from members due to serious concerns about how they would impact the economy, American security, and our constitutional rights.

They will result in less diverse news and views available online

Each bill contains requirements that would result in the government having more control over the moderation of content and which views are considered "acceptable" online.

They harm American businesses, benefitting foreign competitors

They change the law to an arbitrary size standard, rather than measuring a company's true market dominance or whether Americans are actually being harmed. This will benefit foreign competitors by setting back American businesses, which are the envy of the world.
